

Hello friends,

One of the great joys (and challenges) of serving as a pastor is being the person to whom many people ask their most perplexing spiritual questions. If someone is wrestling with a theological issue, or reads something in the Bible that they are confused about, their pastor is often one of the first people they talk to. (Side note: I think that some of the very best questions I get come from kids!)

It's an honor to help people think through these questions. Sometimes, however, people ask me a question that I really don't know the answer to! Or really have to think long-and-hard about!

Yes, even pastors don't have all the answers. And what a great reminder this is that we are not saved by knowledge, but by faith. We can have all the Bible knowledge, or all the knowledge about theology, or church history (or anything else), but if we are trusting in ourselves and how much we know, and not God, then we are in trouble. Ultimately, it's not about how much we know, but how much we are willing to trust God.

Of course, striving to know more about God, or the Bible, is always a good thing. It's just not the most important thing.

Let's keep trusting God together,
Pastor Jordan
