

Friends,

Right now people all around the world are talking about the big interview. I'm sure you know the one I'm talking about--the interview with Prince Harry and his wife Meghan that aired the other night.

Of course, the royals have long been fodder for discussion in the media, and generated lots of headlines. Millions tune in to watch royal weddings, and even take fashion cues from how the royals dress. People wonder what it's really like to be part of the royal family, and love to get a taste of the palace intrigue.

This latest interview was said beforehand to have "explosive allegations" and "untold secrets revealed". As I thought about it, there were many theological points we could take away from the interview, but there's one basic point that I was reflecting upon.

In our country, we are not used to having royalty that we bow down to and serve. Even in Britain, the royalty is something of a relic from the past, more symbolic of past glory than anything else. We can't really imagine what it is like to have a king that we serve, to whom we are totally devoted. But yet, the Bible says we do have a king that we serve. We are supposed to let this king guide us and influence how we live every day. And this king, of course, is Jesus Christ. Every Fall, we even celebrate Christ the King Sunday to remember the king that we serve.

Christ might not get an interview with Oprah like Prince Harry and Meghan (though if there was an interview with him, I'm sure millions would watch), but hopefully we pay him the respect and honor that he deserves with the way we live our daily lives.

Blessings,
Pastor Jordan
